JOB MARKET PAPER

Hiring in a Diverse Labor Market: Spillovers Across Minority Groups Full paper link

In this paper, I design and conduct an online hiring experiment with a geographically representative U.S. sample, where White employers decide whether to hire White, Black, and Hispanic workers. In the experiment, guided by a Bayesian framework featuring asymmetric updating and multiple worker groups, I manipulate the worker groups available for hire. I employ the experiment first to identify and compare biases in beliefs about productivity and hiring against Black and Hispanic workers. I then investigate whether hiring experiences with Black (Hispanic) workers have positive or negative spillovers on beliefs about productivity and the hiring of Hispanic (Black) workers, and whether the answer differs by minority. Results from the experiment show that employers are biased against both Black and Hispanic workers, with the bias being stickier for Hispanic workers. I find positive hiring spillovers from Hispanic to Black workers only: while employers are more likely to hire Black workers after hiring experiences with Hispanic workers, their hiring decisions regarding Hispanic workers are unaffected by previous hiring of Black workers. I provide suggestive evidence that the latter finding is driven by a more pronounced bias against Hispanic workers.

WORKING PAPERS

My Department Cares: Supporting Students Through Encouragement Emails (with D. Serra)

We examine the impact of an intervention targeting all economics majors at a large public university with the aim of providing encouragement during challenging periods in the semester. We randomly selected students who would receive six weekly emails on behalf of the department of economics during the latter half of the Fall 2021 semester. Drawing insights from studies in social psychology, we designed the emails with the aim of enhancing students' sense of belonging, self-efficacy and growth mindset, while providing information about available resources. In addition, for a subsample of the treated students, each email featured a peer role model, i.e., a former student who had recently graduated from the same university. A third treatment group also received an encouragement message from the featured role model. We find evidence of a positive impact of the encouragement emails on women’s academic performance, notably driven by under-represented minority (URM) women. Our analysis of mechanisms points at improvements in URM women’s growth mindset and emotional well-being. These results underscore the critical role of a supportive learning environment in promoting academic success, particularly among students from traditionally marginalized backgrounds.
